

Affiliate Marketing

One of the basic ways that most blogs on the internet support their website activities is to earn commissions through affiliate links. Essentially, every time a website sends a user to the merchant's website, an affiliate fee is earned. This may be pennies or it may be dollars depending on what the customer purchases on the site. This is why so many blogs insert all those ugly irrelevant ads into their posts.

At NutriScape, we do need to support the expenses of the website, but we refuse to sacrifice the quality and professionalism of the site and the user experience in the process.

Promoting Healthy Food Products

NutriScape has found certain merchants who offer healthy food products that have value to our readers. Consumers can benefit from health and nutrition articles that discuss the benefits of these foods either towards their general nutrient intake, towards a better diet for a particular medical issue, or for culinary uses of the products. Many different perspectives could be taken when writing these articles on food items like organic produce, grass fed beef, GMO free alternatives, etc. In each article, the focus should always remain on the informational content of the article rather than on selling the product.

Product Presentation and Affiliate Transparency

Your article about the product will be followed by a heading such as, "Where you Can Find _____ Online". Under the heading, there will be a link to the online retailer. When the user follows the link containing NutriScape's affiliate cookie information and purchases the product, the affiliate fee is generated that helps support the site financially. On each of these articles, the following disclosure statement will appear at the end of the article to make this process clear to the reader.

Affiliate Statement

When you purchase linked products presented on this page, our site receives an affiliate fee which helps to fund the cost of developing the NutriScape.NET site.
